The Ethics of Killing Animals: There Is No One Answer. by Paul McCartney, conservationist and environmental social scientist. There is a saying that the only things we all have in common are birth, death, and taxes. If there is a fourth thing common to every human being on the planet, it is that human lives depend on killing animals.

The Ethics of Killing Animals - There Is No One Answer

Chapter 10 bases duties toward animals on deontological foundations. It discusses the ethics of killing nonhuman animals from the viewpoint of Kantian constructivism, which regards the validity of reasons as determined by a procedure that involves the agreement of all concerned. The only beings that have moral status on the basis of such justifications are those that are able to agree with our ...

Ethics of Eating Animals. In any discussion concerning the ethics of eating animals, it's important to begin by considering a frequently overlooked distinction: that harming and killing animals from necessity is not morally equivalent to harming and killing animals for pleasure. Just as shooting someone in self-defense is not commensurate with shooting someone to satisfy a sadistic urge— killing animals for food when we have no other choice for survival is not morally equivalent to ...
